ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Jim Childs is the smart, unassuming, persistent person responsible for getting this book into print. From the time we finished The TeamNet Factor, our last book, Jim called monthly, asking, always gently, for the next book. Authors dream of such persistence from publishers. Jim also contributed much thought to this book, including the inspiration for future trends. And, once again, he read and made suggestions on every chapter. Jim, thank you for your generosity and easy way of working.

Thanks to Mike Snell for introducing us to Jim and to Darryl Landvater, president of Oliver Wight Publications, an inspiring businessman and generous counselor, who hired Jim.

Next, thanks to Debra Church-Smith, our long-time colleague at The Networking Institute. Seven years already, Deb, of spirit lifting, opportunity spotting, client supporting, workshop making, mega-communicating, and book writing, not to mention a couple of children. There should be 100 words for thank you here.

Thanks for the title of this book go to George Gendron, editor of Inc. magazine. George ran an excerpt from The TeamNet Factor in his monthly “FYI” column, titling it “The Age of the Network.” We saw it and realized that we had the title for this book. A few months later, we were sitting in our local coffee shop, talking with Bob Elmore, head of Business Systems Consulting at Arthur Andersen & Co., when he leaned forward and said, “What you’re talking about are ‘organizing principles for the 21st century.’” Bingo, the subtitle.

Deep bows to six people dedicated enough to line-edit the entire manuscript without being asked: Kathi Albertini (for responsiveness and critical advice), Lilly Evans (“Most Prompt Reader” award), Judy Laws, David Stephenson, Joan Vitello, and Marion Metcalf. Marion was also “guardian angel” for this book, always asking how it was was very calming. Al Gilman ably assisted Marion in this noble effort. Thanks, you two.

Another group scrutinized parts of the manuscript and offered critical comments: Frank Alla (an expert on trust), Harry Brown, Martin Gillo, Thommy Haglund, Bob Joines, Nancy Ledford, Mike Plummer, Gunther Singer, Bill Smith, Frank Starmer, and Joe Szocik.

When Elizabeth Meyer Lorentz, our long-time mentor on the coordinator role in networks, learned that we were writing this book, she wrote a detailed background paper, which we drew on extensively for chapter 7. Elizabeth, again and forever, our dear friend.

Mark Abramson, Rebecca Adamson, Karen Belding, Forrest Bjerkaas, David Brace, Don Brown, Andy Campbell, Allan Cohen, Camen Criswell, Dennis Egan, Manny Elkind, Paul Fogleman, Susan Goran, Rogier Gregoire, Damon Hemmerdinger, Mallika Henry, Karl Leatham, Peter +Trudy Johnson-Lenz, Gregg Lichtenstein, Geri Lincoln, Judy Lucarelli, Gosta Lundqvist, Annie Marascia, Oliver Markley, Bill Miller, Eddie Molloy, Lyn Montague, Charlene O'Brien (and family), Doug Parker, Frank Reece, Will Roberts, Debra Amidon Rogers, David Ryder, Karim Saouli, Charles Savage, Ann Schwartz, Judith Gilman Schwenk, Navjeet Singh, Gail Snowden, Nova Spivack, Evelyne Steward, Peter Thibeault, Nancy Weeks, Lavinia Weissman, David Williams, and Duncan Work all contributed ideas.

Special thanks to our "TeamNet Workshoppers" for participating in our ongoing discussions of trust and social capital.

Sting provided Fields of Gold, the background music. Tom Peters, great networker, gave The TeamNet Factor its first name-recognition boost. The Internet greased the lines of communication, joining in "the pod." J. Gordon Lippincott, founder of Lippincott and Margulies, the New York design firm, sent us the logo that appears on the front of this book. We've used it as our corporate mark since 1983, when we received it. Thanks, again, Gordon.

Sandy Billings, Rita and Bill Cleary, and Anne Starr, all of The Learning Circle, spread the word. Rick Berenson and David Cray kept the business going at critical moments. Ann Stamps instantly responded to a crisis. Eric Lipnack and Carol Roman eased a painful transition. Erwin and Marianne Jaffe and Judy Smith were always there with love. Bill and Pam Johnson's early sponsorship was a powerful launching pad, with great help from Ulf Fagerquist. Virginia Hine and Bucky Fuller continue to inspire.

Our two teenagers may have sometimes gone without dinner while we wrote this book, but they thrived. Miranda Stamps attained a rare (even for adults) level of maturity in 1994, studying, working, speaking, being with friends, and, most important, driving. Eliza Stamps learned to counsel, bike, traverse the city (and the world), do art, and study, all with originality. You were a toddler, Mirmy, when we started this networking work, and Liza, you were just a pregnancy. Now you are vibrant networkers yourselves and our closest advisors. Girls, we thank you and we love you.
